

Frequency23 Can iT really happen?

Contributed by admin
Thursday, 23 February 2006
Last Updated Thursday, 13 November 2008

Today we see the birth of Frequency23, or frq23 for short. Frq23 aims to be a platform where different people who tune in to the same frequency meet and conspire to create a better world … for themselves.

The emphasis is on different people. Even though I pledge loyalty and support from Hypnocrisis.com to frq23, as we are certainly on the same frequency, I do hope that we cherish a model of conflict rather than harmony. It’s OK to agree not to agree. As long as we pool our resources together to have some fun.

Call it a platform for creating temporary autonomous zones. Or rather Open Source Reality. Linux took the world by storm. The development model of Linux shows how a loosely knit group can have a major impact on the world. Let’s use the same model for reality too, I would say.

It’s important to weed out the stupid people in your circle of friends and import cool ones. If frq23 becomes a place where people meet and group together to go off to do their own little projects, that would be übercool. Who knows what kind of things might grow out of iT? I am certainly happy with the inspiring people that I already met and who made this platform possible.

Soon we will see more and more people joining in, building bridges between different worlds. Creating alliances in different respects and before you know iT, you have accomplished much. And it doesn’t all have to be bits and bites in the digital world. I happen to be informed that quite a few real world events are being planned as we speak.

So feel free to add what you want to share and to take what you want to have. As long as we cherish our differences and enjoy the ride, all should be very well indeed these coming months and years. I hope to see lots of you.

From Hypnocrisis.com